DY T. W. PARSONS. From this loved window and my Cardinal's chair watch the world's face altering with the hours. From frost and drifts and ice-bound brooks to flowers And catch spring-shadows on a landscape bare. In youth bleak Winter chilled me to despair My ravaged woodland walk, my broken bowers, Brought dreams of death, freezing my folded powers; Or worse, a life of penury and care! But Time has taught me this; If hope's a cloud, Changing its colour till it melt away, Fear is as fanciful. Our hearts pro cowed By their own conjuring; the riper day... A CALIFORNIAN LANDSCAPE The atmosphere (says a traveller) was so soft and balmy that it was a positive enjoyment to feel it brushing over one's face like we left behind us The scene all round us beheld the countries of the earth from the suddmit of a high mountain.: Out of sight one's ideas with the babitable globe but the ship on which one stands; but there is also nothing to carry the imagination beyond what one does see, and the view is limited to a few miles. But here we were upon an ocean of grass-covered carth, dotted with trees, and sparkling in the sunshine with the gorgeous hues of the dense patches of wild flowers; while far beyond the horizon of the plains there rose mountains beyond mountains, all so distinctly seen as to leave no uncertainty as to the shape or the relative position of any one of them, and fading away in regular gradation till the most distinct, though clearly defined, seemed still to be the most natural and satisfactory point at which the view should terminate: It was as if the circumstance of the earth had been lifted up to the utmost range of vision, and there melted into air.
